

This was addressed by the featured study over a three-year period at a single VA primary care clinic where reminder use was neither routine nor expected or incentivised. The reminder system was implemented in one randomly selected part of the clinic but not in the other part, offering a way to compare performance with and without the system in the same clinic. Implementation consisted solely of setting up the system and one e-mail to tell providers about this in the selected part of the clinic.